The Ambassador’s Club is a program linking a voluntary association of ambassadors of the United Nations with university students in the United States. Its objective is to create a better understanding in tomorrow’s leaders of what the United Nations is and what its numerous programs do to make the world a safer place.

Ambassador Pablo Solón was appointed permanent representative of Bolivia to the United Nations last year. He is currently Bolivia’s special ambassador for issues concerning integration and trade. Before his appointment to the United Nations, he was deputy permanent representative and chargé d’affaires from 2008 to 2009. Solón was secretary pro tempore to the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) during Bolivia’s presidency, from December 2006 to May 2008, having served as Bolivian President Evo Morales’ delegate to the Strategic Reflection Committee for South American Integration in 2006.

Solón was the Andean spokesman for the Pillar of Cooperation in the Andean Community of Nations-European Union (CAN-EU) negotiations from 2007 to 2008.

From 1997 to 2005, he was executive director of the Solón Foundation.
